I was on my way home from dropping off my daughter when I came up from the left lane of a box truck whose front blinker was indicating they were going to turn left. I noticed that their back blinker wasn't flashing, perhaps there was faulty wiring. I had the conviction to almost get out of my car, stroll up alongside them, and inform them, but I just let it go. At that, the light turned green and traffic began to flow. I noticed that that same truck continued through the intersection, they didn't go left, and their hazards were on.

Out of ambiguity, I had come to a conclusion that made sense to me. I was about to act on it. It was incomplete though.

We look at slices of reality and form conclusions and opinions all the time. We feel convicted in how we feel. Moved. Turns out, I just couldn't see the other side of the truck where that other hazard light was there all along, inaccessible to me. Taking a step back, having one's foot on the brake pedal at a red light also makes sense, but surely, I knew better, surely, the blinker would have overridden the solid red brake light. There might have been another explanation elsewhere, but I have the only explanation I need from this experience.

I can feel so moved to say something else is wrong, or point out a problem that isn't there. Maybe it's just about being present a little more. Suspending judgment a little longer. To notice a little more.

What other things am I quick to diagnose in my life without complete information? Not to be too hard on myself, but did the truck have a case of faulty wiring? Or did I? And if the lens through which I look into the world makes mistakes, how do I proceed knowing what I know now? The same? Or make a slight adjustment? To tread a little lighter.
